Materials such as fiberglass have been in use for some time as an economical source of electricity. In recent times, the economic viability of such materials has been enhanced by the inclusion of so-called solar cells formed of a small amount of photovoltaic material, such as silicon, that is bonded to a web of such material. However, such presently known photovoltaic systems are only usable to a small degree as a power source because they cannot generate sufficient electricity to operate even the smallest electronic devices. The present invention is directed to a method and apparatus for converting acoustic or sonic energy to electricity to provide a power supply for an electronic device. The disclosed invention is of particular significance as a power source for an audio or video tape recorder, amplifier, or other electronic device. It is desirable to convert a portion of acoustic or sonic energy to electrical energy to provide a power source for electronic devices. The power capacity of known electrical power supplies is often limited due to the maximum amperage that such power supplies are capable of providing. Furthermore, known power supplies must be powered by a continuous source of power, such as, for example, an alternating current source, and are often bulky and expensive. Because known power supplies have been designed primarily for one-time use, the quantity of power that can be provided by such power supplies is somewhat limited, even though such power supplies are often self-contained and do not require the provision of a power source. It is particularly desirable to provide a more efficient, smaller, and less costly power supply for electronic devices.Griffon's exclusive online casino Using special devices in order to play several games and earn free spins, this online casino is the best online casino for many players.
