A "game that creates game culture" The world of the Elden Ring game world - a fantasy world created by Vana, was born about 10,000 years ago. Since that time, it has struggled alongside the people of the Lands Between, expanding as the landscape and composition of the world changed, and the various races that were born before it were driven out. The four races, Humans, Elves, Orcs and Dunmer, made their appearance during these changes. Since then, the Elden Ring has stabilized as a state, and the lands of the Lands Between have been falling into an era of early peace. The harmony in the world is fragile, however, and the Elden Ring has begun to look to the cultivation of a power source. The success of the Elden Ring has been somewhat reduced by the fact that the Elden Ring's territory is such a huge region, and that it occupies a position that is not quite a state and yet not quite an empire. The character and culture of the Elden Ring is changing with the growth of the world, and everyone who lives between the two has been driven toward the idea that the Lands Between should unite under the Elden Ring's banner. today was a good day to review The Crow: Part 1. This was one of the first games that I reviewed, so it's kind of crazy how it's sitting there now, so I decided to finally get around to it. It's also a vintage game for me. I was eight years old when I played it, so this was around the time I started really playing games - my parents were fairly modern (for 1971) so they actually got really into consoles and things during my infancy. I remember a few consoles too - my dad had a Nintendo and a Super Scuter and I loved them both. I specifically remember my first experience with a fully 3D system - a Super Scuter II game called Hunt the Wumpus. I still have that game and some of the 3D glasses that accompanied it.

Today, though, wasn't fun. This was The Old Game. From what I hear, most of the old games were lost, so the only ones that survived are the ones that people remember fondly. Well, not so for me with The Crow. It's got bad memories with me. I remember the game had a stock of 26 action scenes, so I would go back and play it until I thought I knew it by heart. So that would be four or five games in a row and I'd do it over and over again.
